A BALLOON IN A CYCLONE.

Ada Mitchell, who made a balloon ascension from the exhibition grounds in Rutland, Vt., on Wednesday, has returned. She alighted on Rochester mountain, 26 miles distant, after a perilous voyage.

"The wind was blowing almost a gale," she said, "when I was preparing to start. The ballast had hardly left the basket, when the balloon shot upward and off to the north with a marvelous speed, that increased every moment as I got into the higher air current. This, with the triple ascending force due to the absence of the ballast, gave a maximum speed of a mile a minute. I was four thousand feet above the sea. I had no sooner entered the clouds than the car began to toss and lunge frantically in the cross currents. I do not know how long I was in the cyclone."

"The last bag of ballast was pitched overboard. The balloon shot upward with the rapidity of lightning, and in a few seconds I was gliding quietly but rapidly through a clear atmosphere with the bright sunshine about me. It was still cold, but the air was free from the dampness that prevailed in the clouds, and I began to get warm and regain my composure. I took out my barometer again, and found that I was at an altitude of 8,000 feet, or more than a mile and a quarter. I pulled the rope connected with the escape valve, and soon began to descend.

"On reaching the clouds I again encountered cross-currents. I tried to close the escape valve, but it had become jammed in some manner and would not shut. I kept working at the rope, at the same time throwing out my anchor. Soon, to my relief, the valve closed together with a snap, and the balloon slackened its pace. The anchor caught, and a moment later I found myself in the top of a large spruce tree. I climbed down and made my way down the mountain by following a small stream. I came out into a large clearing, in the center of which stood a house. I was hospitably entertained over night, and the next day, after engaging a man to get my airship, box it, and send it to Rutland, I was driven to Randolph station and arrived in the city at noon. The landing was made on one of the desolate heights of the Green Mountain Range."
